Dear Tara,

"Summertime ... and the livin' is easy." That's a nice thought, but far from the truth for NCCCO, as this month's issue of CCOnline indicates. Read on for news about the introduction of separate CCO certification cards for crane operators who have also been certified in the Rigger and/or Signalperson categories, as well as new color-coded certification cards for readily identifying qualifications in the field.

You'll also discover that all CCO written exams may now be taken at computer testing centers. Not only are calculators now permissible when taking certain exams, but Manitowoc Cranes has donated 10,000 calculators for candidates' use. And successful candidates even receive a Crane Operator Experience Book.

This issue also has news about successful events, including NCCCO's Biannual Meeting, Practical Examiner Workshops in Philadelphia and Salt Lake City, and a Fun Run in Austin to raise awareness of crane safety. One jurisdiction that's acutely aware of crane safety is New York City, which now uses CCO Certification as the referenced credential for crane operators. You'll learn how nothing less than a team of ten CCO-certified operators was needed for the complex lift of an offshore platform deck. And you'll meet the directors and officers who will keep NCCCO moving forward through 2012-2013.

NCCCO has begun to issue separate CCO certification cards to CCO-certified crane operators who have also been certified in the CCO Rigger and/or Signalperson categories. Previously, all certifications were listed on one card. The new cards will also reflect the full five-year certification period for each category. Previously, all certifications had a common expiration date, regardless of when the candidates passed the test(s).
